

November 17, 2008: Amigle has arrived and is positioned to help individuals share and manage their business and personal contact information. It is simple, secure and free.

The creation of Amigle came from a frustrated colleague who lost a business card and was frantically looking for it one morning. "This lost contact information resulted in, a lost business opportunity of $250K," according to the founder and CEO of Amigle Frank Makrides. With Amigle, people will never have to manage contacts; all their information will be up-to-date through our self-managing database.

Amigle has developed a revolutionary software platform that simplifies the way we exchange and manage the information in our personal and professional lives. With one simple step you can exchange information in a person-to-person or group setting and instantaneously view that information. You never need to store or manage your contacts ever again. The information is not static; a change in address, phone number, email, etc. is automatically updated and reflected in your account.

Those who use Amigle can choose which profiles to share. Three options include a professional, person or default profile. Members can invite their friends and colleagues who also use Amigle. Amigle is accessible anytime with a computer and most mobile Web browsers.

Amigle has made great strides by entering the marketplace as a self-funded start-up. In the two weeks of existence of the Web, they have quickly built a 500 member user base across 4 continents. Amigle's strategy is to virally grow through web-based marketing and strategic partnering.

On the horizon, Amigle will soon release the highly anticipated iPhone application and develop on all other major mobile platforms such as Android, Blackberry, Windows Mobile and Symbian. This will allow Amigle to access the greater universe of mobile phone users.

About Amigle

Amigle eliminates the frustration, wasted time and lost opportunities caused by managing contact information real time through the Amigle platform. Amigle enhances the user experience by allowing seamless exchange of information in person, one-on-one or in a group setting.
